geneRaTing 'mo Re Fairness'

Interview with Tony Woods, KLC director 1 -

I came from a strong Catholic family, we were always involved in doing a range of things from the family base and the school base, it was part of life to try and generate more fairness. The interest in the law was more vague. My childhood aim was to be a vet but I didn't do well enough in the HSC so I thought, 'oh well, law sounds nice.'
I started at UNSW in 1976. At that stage they had the first year in the library tower, their first round of graduates were just coming out. I worked at RLC as a student and got on

I left in 1990 because I got to the stage where I was feeling frustrated with the students, and frustrated with the clients. KLC was a candle always burning at two ends. You had the rotating students, every 14 weeks there's a new batch who don't know how to answer a phone and don't know how to write a letter. So I suppose I was starting to feel tired of having to teach the same thing over and over.

Simon Rice had worked for RLC and had gone overseas. When I decided to leave I knew that Simon was on his way back to Sydney and I guess in the way that Neil had realised part of his job was to find – like every leader I suppose – a successor, that this was also my job. Knowing Simon, and knowing his relationship with the University and his other credentials, I was pretty confident that he was going to succeed in getting appointed and would do a great job.

its board as a student representative. I was the student representative on the Law School Committee Ron Sackville set up to establish KLC, or to explore what it was going to be. When the Centre opened in my last year the clinical legal experience course offered a placement at KLC, but given what I'd already done at RLC I didn't take that up.

I finished college and I was working at the Commonwealth Bank when KLC advertised a position – that was late 1983, and I commenced there at the start of '84. I had the grand title of being a 'consultant to the faculty'. But my role was basically to be a casework lawyer who, as part of that casework, was teaching the students. And that's what I did with Neil Rees and Robyn Lansdowne, until I applied for and went off to PIAC.

However, not long after I left KLC for PIAC, Neil decided he would relocate to Melbourne – so I came back.

There were a few changes I made as Director. One was to try to increase the academic component. We added a bit more structure to the seminars each week and I started a student assessment system to be more rigorous about performance. I and the other lawyers also spent a bit more time giving guest lectures in other subjects.

When I decided to look for a city job, I was told by a recruitment agency that because of my background I would be unemployable in the city, but I just wrote off to firms who I knew had partners who had been involved in the legal centre scene, and I ended up at Henry Davis York. I've been here ever since. I came here originally as a general commercial litigator, but over time leapfrogging from the discrimination work I did at KLC and with the help of others, I've built an employment industrial law practice, which is employer focused but still does some work for employees from time to time. We have had a whole range of lawyers at Henry Davis York who have continued to volunteer their time out at KLC. At one stage during Fran Gibson's funding crisis my partners agreed to put someone out there for six months, and towards the end of that program I tried to form up with three other firms to fund a permanent position out there that didn't come about. At the time, Fran said that what she was really looking at doing was forming an Employment Advice Program, and I got seven others to sign up with us to send one of our lawyers out every week.

'This Is What I'm about'

Interview with Simon Rice, KLC director 1 1- 5

I was brought up as a Catholic; it's not a belief I have now and I don't practise. But on reflection I think that while at school the Jesuits alerted me to questions of social justice. However when I went to university I was just a kid having a good time – so it wasn't until later that I came back to what had been an unconscious foundation. My family was working upper middle class family, but my mother had a layperson's social justice perspective and we'd talk about such things.

had the same experience if I'd found myself in a community health centre. It wasn't the law, it was the connection with need and my ability to meet need that got me excited. So my law degree revolved principally around RLC and law reviews – if I wasn't singing and dancing, I was at RLC.

By the time I'd graduated I'd just fallen into the usual pattern of applying for a summer clerkship, and the firm I'd worked for offered me a job on graduation. I continued with my volunteer role at RLC. I hadn't really thought things through, and after 18 months travel I just ended up with that commercial firm. I was severely chastised by a senior lawyer at RLC, who was angry at me for not applying for a job there. I suppose I hadn't really worked out where my priorities were, and I remember being really shaken that she was so upset that I had taken the commercial path. In hindsight, it was the right thing to do: in 15 months I learnt

I dropped out of Law School after a year because I found, after being a big fish in a small pond at school, university was really disorienting and I was doing commerce/law which I didn't really want to do. So I went to Nepal, drove round Australia and grew up a bit. When I went back to Law School I had a great time engaging with things. RLC had an office actually on campus at the Law School, and I put my name down to be a volunteer. I honestly can't recall having any great aspirations or ambitions but probably was just picking up on that sense of social justice.

I can vividly remember my first day there, and it sparked. I just thought 'yes!'. Not '... this is what law is about' but '... this is what ~~the~~ about'. If I was doing medicine, I would have about being a lawyer, about standards and practices, the way things worked – it was a fantastic experience, and pretty seductive... However, despite being given an office with a window, I left the firm.

KLC started in 1981, which was my penultimate year. I didn't have any special connection with the Centre, all my attention was on RLC – RLC at that time had a very strong UNSI a l oU ack wanted to help to change that. By the time I actually got to the ICAC as Principal Lawyer, a lot of time had passed because of the security clearance procedures and the organisation no longer had jurisdiction over police. I ended up only working for the ICAC for about a year because I did not feel I was really helping anyone in my work there. I volunteered as a solicitor at RLC during this time.

Simon Rice, whose job I had taken at RLC, rang me up and urged me to apply for the Director's job at KLC. People used to call KLC the 'boring blokes' legal centre' as only men worked there as lawyers, with three [female] secretaries. But it had a reputation for excellent and innovative legal cases. I came to work at KLC because it had all the elements I liked about legal centres, with students as an extra aspect. Simon and the other two were pretty incredible lawyers and really hard working. When I started I couldn't understand how he could have possibly done this job – there were so many aspects to it. I would arrive early every morning just to have an hour or two to be able to grasp what was going on. On the whole the Centre had great staff, good ideas about what cases should be run, a really good history. It was certainly established and set up in a good way. The actual student program worked on the whole really well before I came. Everything that they had done had contributed to establishing a really good clinical program and legal centre.

The stolen generations case that the Centre worked on was the most important thing we did at KLC while I was there. Paul Batley started that case – he is a really great lawyer. It was the most inspiring case yet \ the most depressing! We lost all the way to the High Court. But these cases will be recognised one day – even though it may take 20-50 years. Besides that, I was involved in the set up of the Employment Law Clinic; helped introduce the Law Lawyers and Society program whereby every student at UNSW attends the Centre during their degree; restructured the academic component of the course; and revamped the structure of the Centre so it was more of a collective rather than running like a private legal office. We also introduced and ran the first clinical course for first year Indigenous students while I was there.

I think the only thing that can be important in a legal centre's work really is anything that achieves change in the law or legal and policy systems. Everyday casework is of course very important but I think the test cases, for instance the first stolen generation case, was incredible – no-one else was running cases like that. Also setting the Centre up to run discrimination cases was really important in terms of assisting clients and the publicity those sorts of cases generated and the policy that develops from that kind of casework. Every student who has changed their views even a little bit can make a difference in Australia too.

A big part of the value of a place like KLC is that a lot of important people in Australia's legal society will have been through KLC and maybe that will be the most important thing in achieving change because it will mean that all lawyers will have some conception of seeing what it is like to not have money and actually seeing disadvantage. A lot of students will go on to be politicians who will effect change. That process has already assisted establishing various pro-bono services.

When I started at KLC there was talk of moving to the UNSW campus, but no-one ever thought anything was really going to happen, so it was not really an issue for me. I am in favour of KLC being in the new Law Building. The only concern is an issue of accessibility. It will be easier for students involved in the Centre, because it's not so separated and they can pop down and have a look at the files. Another advantage would be that the academics c
